NEW QUESTION: 1

Which four configuration elements are managed by the dumpadm utility?

- A. the reserved file system space that a core dump may not use
- B. the location of the savecore directory
- C. the compression of the crash dump file

- D. the location of the dump device
- E. the index number for the next core dump
- F. the size of the dump device

Answer: A,B,C,D

Explanation:

dumpadm - configure operating system crash dump

SYNOPSIS

/usr/sbin/dumpadm [-nuy] [-c content-type] [-d dump-device]
[-m mink | minm | min%] [-s savecore-dir]
[-r root-dir] [-z on | off]

The options include:

A: -d dump-device

Modify the dump configuration to use the specified dump device.

B: -s savecore-dir

Modify the dump configuration to use the specified directory to save files written by savecore.

D: -m mink | minm | min%

Create a minfree file in the current savecore directory indicating that savecore should maintain at least the specified amount of free space in the file system where the savecore directory is located.

E: -z on | off Modify the dump configuration to control the operation of savecore on reboot. The options are on, to enable saving core files in a compressed format, and off, to automatically uncompress the crash dump file. The default is on, because crash dump files can be very large and require less file system space if saved in a compressed format.
